The night my water broke, a week early, I held my wide sides and rocked, knowing that before another day came, no matter what the pain, you would be born. And then I went upstairs to my quiet study. It was two a.m. and my last chance to be alone with poetry for what I knew, the second time around, would be a long exhausted, milk-pocked haul. Every time I stood to take a book down from the shelf, your waters poured out of me. I sat and wrote until the contractions became too strong. Slowly I was drawn by the rope around my hips, dipped in and out of that well of pain. In between I sipped rose tea, marked a few last-minute changes on a manuscript, dripped and dripped and dripped.

In the hospital a day later, they handed me you in the recovery room. My abdomen had been stapled shut and I was still numb from the ribcage down. We were in a room full of the knock and rattle of jackhammers. Plastic sheeting covered the drywall remodel.
“You should breastfeed her now,” said the nurse, and I couldn’t quite believe it. “Now?” I complained, more child than mother, “I’m pretty tired right now,” but the nurse set her lips, untied my hospital gown, helped that tiny rosemouth yawn and latch onto the breast. I gasped as the baby’s tugs burned the thin skin, then laughed at her fine round face as she squinted at us, blinking her eyes, and we were blessed, and wiped our eyes.

The nurse, leaning over my bed, said to us they were bringing in a woman to recovery whose baby had just died. She did not need to ask us to stifle our delight. The woman was wheeled in, moaning but sedated. The nurse pulled the curtain around her bed, and I held my newborn, her eyes still glistening with erythromycin, the small white bonnet pulled over her wet hair, and only a thin curtain separated me from the mother whose baby had died: I don’t mean a metaphorical curtain, I mean a thin green hospital curtain on a metal track, and I wished, but dared not, pull it back.
